All right, troops. There's bread in the break room. Go try it out and tell me if it's better or worse than what I usually bring in.

Hmm. Good crust, fluffy inside, toothsome and chewy. Really good, actually, and I'm guessing from the color it's all or part whole wheat?

I give this one an A.

Half whole wheat.

It's a four-day loaf. Sponge on Thursday, rose overnight, added the salt and the rest of the flour, and let it sit in the fridge for two days to cure before shaping it Saturday and rising it over Saturday night and most of yesterday in the cold corner of the kitchen.

The question is, is it 48 hours better than the regular loaves?

The real question is, who am I what have I done with Daphne, talking about this like I know what I'm saying.

It has a good open crumb, but not too loose. It could be sammiches. Chewy sammiches.

It might be 36 hours better than your regular bread...

Mmmm. An excellent chaser for the kimchee I had for breakfast!

I heard some discontented grumbling Down the Hall; they smelled it as you passed by on your way in. I believe they're discussing assigning someone to learn to bake.

(Let me know in advance next time, and I'll bring in the second jar of homemade blackcurrant jam a friend gave me.)

Breakfast kimchee. That's hardcore.

Shall we plan on Monday, if there isn't a you-know-what?

I'll try not to open it before then, but if I start to twitch and roll my eyes, you'll know what's happening.

You have friends that make jam?

The process is surprisingly similar to...well, never mind that now.
